Friends - my mother once told me - are like clothes. There are the every day ones; the ones that regardless of your mood or the occasion, will be there, will fit, will complete you (and won't mind the occasional stint on your bedroom floor). There are the ones that you hold in the highest regard, wrapped in a tissue paper of tenderness, but for some reason, you only bring them out for special occasions. There are the weathered ones that are far from attractive but (so long as no one of importance is looking) they are the ones you want to snuggle up with on a Sunday. There are the risqué ones that only come out when you're feeling naughty. There are the ones that remain stuffed away, never utilised (you're not sure why you have them but you can't quite bring yourself to cull them). On the flipside, there are the ones that you once cherished but on closer inspection, wonder what you ever saw in them and bin them without a second thought. There are also the ones that are totally impractical, and more often than not, when you go out with them, you come home without them. There are the ones that you call upon when you want to impress someone, want something or need to get in somewhere. And of course there is the wonderful, satisfying process of acquiring the new ones... READ FULL REVIEW
