A LONDON chef who had only £2.50 to his name a year ago has won a top restaurant award.

Ian Pengelley's career had nosedived into debt, misery and despair following a succession of ill-fated career moves, and his critics said he would never recover.

But last night the 36-year-old proved them wrong as he received a Tatler Restaurant Award for new restaurant Gilgamesh. The restaurant, which opened less than eight months ago in Camden, won in the Most Original Restaurant category for its innovative menu, location and huge popularity. "It's good to be back," said Mr Pengelley after accepting the award.
